THIS IS THE YEAR

Paul West
your hat to the Glad New your voice with a hopeful

That sort of resolve is old?
like a tale too often told?

to do this particular year Its new!
you grouch, not the same old dudled up year you've left be-each day and each minute too!
each second is fresh-laid,
for the things you've left unfor the races you haven't run!
for ambitions unachieved!
for mistakes unretrieved!
for unfinished efforts too!
for the things you mean to do!

one day in its bill of fare
be another day anywhere, if a year can be fresh and new in the dickens can't you be

Ambition's garments bright, your cigar with the Future's say to yourself: "The old year's dead.
it deep! Look right ahead!
New Year laid out for me,
all of chances as it can be,
out of my way and let me go!

cotte Home, afterward returning to Paris where she and her sister,
Miss Della, went to housekeeping.
She was the daughter of John and the program was very nicely carried out.

Saturday evening the Federated Sunday School enjoyed a Christmas tree and refreshments at the Chapel.

Monday evening the Universalist
Sunday School enjoyed their annual Christmas family supper. About 165 enjoyed the bountiful supper under the direction of the Glad Hand Class, and about 200 were present at the Christmas play, A Boy Whom Nobody Wanted. The

was all very fine.

Tuesday afternoon the Men's 44 Class gave a Christmas party to children, 12 and under, at I. O. O.
F. Hall. 185 children were invited week.

ternoon. Santa Claus was also there. This week the children and teacher, Miss Day, are enjoying a vacation.

Moses Hardy is at home.

cis Cole were at Norway last Saturday. Mr. and Mrs. Herman Cole

SOUTH WOODSTOCK

Would that the world might enjoy a Lappy Christmas; that the Star of the East again brings glad tidings of Peace on earth good will toward men.

Dec. 22—Yesterday the snow began to fall and today everything is covered with a white blanket of feathery lightness. How beautiful this first snow fall of winter under which Mother Nature cradles her children.

Stanley Andrews is at home from his schoolwork in Boston for the Christmas holidays.

Atwood Radcliff left town Dec.
22 for Lowell, Mass., where he will visit his brother and family, Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Radcliff and their new baby, a little daughter.

Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Woodsum of Saugus, Mass., with their sons, Sidney Perham and George Albert spent the week end with Mrs.
Woodsum's parents, Mr. and Mrs.
Quimby Perham, and family at the Perham homestead. On Sunday a bountiful Christmas dinner was served after which a lovely big Christmas tree was enjoyed by all.
Especially to the great delight of the grandchildren, all of whom old Santa remembered with many many Christmas gifts. Mr. and Mrs. Woodsum were obliged to return to Sau-gus at an early date necessitating the celebration of their Christmas festivities at Grandpa Perham's on Sunday.

The Willing Workers met at the Union Church Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 19. The day was rather cold so at an early hour smoke issued from the chimney showing that some thoughtful personage had gotten everything in readiness.
At two o'clock the ladies began to arrive and soon a goodly number were ready for the work at hand.
A quilting party, sure, that was what it was; the quilts to be used as Christmas gifts. This meeting was to have been held with Mrs.
Cora Perham at the Perham homestead but through an unavoidable circumstance Mrs. Perham was unable to entertain at this time.
Therefore the church gathering.
The Willing Workers at this meeting were invited to attend the Union School Christmas entertainment, their names having been drawn on the Christmas exchange list. The invitation was heartily accepted and plans made to assist in making the Christmas for the children a happy event with refreshments served by the Willing Workers.

The teachers of Union School,
Miss Mary Hendrickson and Mrs.
Olive Pingree Davis, arranged for a Christmas Tree and entertainment at the school rooms on Thursday evening, Dec. 20. At an early hour the rooms were full to overflowing with the friends and relatives of the school children. A social hour preceded the exercises which was spent in exchanging the season's greetings and neighborly pleasantries. I much regret in not having obtained a list of the exercises but I remember that one of the beginners, Edith Manola Davis, gave the welcome and opening piece which was nicely done, followed by many other little folks one and all doing very creditably their part of the exercises. Santa Claus was there to make the children happy. A big tree loaded with presents was a beautiful sight.

Everyone was remembered. A holiday of a week will now be held to give the children a rest period from their school work.

It's kind o' tough t' have t' leave
So many folks you've learned t' know,
An' have 'em grip yer hand an' tell
How much they hate t' see you go!
It's kind o' tough t' say goodbye
To friends you've seen day after day—
It's hard t' break the happy bonds
O' comradeship an' move away.

It's hard t' pack up all yer things
An' leave a cozy home behind—
The place where joys have come t' you,
Where neighbors all have been so kind,
An' when, at last, yer dearest pal
Is tryin' hard t' make a bluff
At bein' brave, an' breaks right down—
It's a kind o' tough, it's kind o' tough!

But say! It's great t' find new friends,
Just waitin' fer a chance t' show
How glad they are t' have you come
An' live with 'em! It's great t' know That folks 're just about the same
No matter where you chance t' roam,
An' if you let 'em have their way
You'll soon be feelin' right at home.

So, it's a long farewell, old friends;
May God be mighty good t' you!
Across the miles an' down the years
You'll find my friendship always true.
And now I turn with eager heart
T' meet whatever life extends—
T' greet the folks that welcome me,
An' try t' make them all my friends.

THE MAINE MEETING PLACE

by EARLE DOUCETTE

Now, and for several months to come, the name of a city—St. Petersburg, Florida—will be emblazoned across the columns of the newspapers of a nation. St. Petersburg, in Florida—will be grown to be one of the most noted winter resorts in the world. Not just one of the best known, we might add, but also one of the most unusual. For St. Petersburg diverts sharply from the common conception of a winter resort. It is not the usual hey-nonny-nunny and hot-cha-cha sort of place where the presumably "smart" set bask on the warm sands with the usual accompaniment of the gin-guzzling and off-color activities.

Rather, it is a city patronized by the old. Couples on the shady side of existence gather there by the thousands to escape the rigors of northern winters. Nice old people they are, relatives, perhaps, of yours and mine. Done with the serious business of raising families, they are enjoying while they may, a brief moment of peace and relaxation.

For their comfort and entertainment, St. Petersburg has built parks and recreation fields. Parks where they can sit on benches and listen to the brassy music of a band that plays for their especial benefit: recreation fields where they can enjoy the quiet sports of shuffle-board, horseshoes, and the like. In short, St. Petersburg is as quiet, serene and sedate, as the people who vacation there. It is a shrine for the loved ones of a nation, those who are growing old.

Of course St. Petersburg didn't just grow that way. It is the shining result of the vision and insight of an individual who worked against great odds to sell an idea that he treasured in a sick body. His name is Al Lang. His story is a saga worthy of perpetuation.

Al, at one time, was a newspaper man rated among the best. One day he was stricken. Doctors gave him a year to live—a little longer if he wintered in Florida.

By chance, he wandered into St. Petersburg, sick, discouraged, and resigned to his fate. For months he merely waited for what he thought was the inevitable. A year passed, then another. To his surprise he found that slowly but surely he was recovering. At last complete recovery was assured.

Perhaps it is small wonder he decided to devote his life to the cause of furthering the interests of the city that had given him an armistice with death. It is easy to see how he envisioned the place as a winter paradise for the old and week. He knew, too, of the financial benefits that the city itself would derive from such a trade.

And so Al started out to sell the idea to the natives. He gave estimates of what such tourist revenue would mean to the city, and how it would enjoy the unique distinction of being the only one of its kind in the country.

The inhabitants thought it was a great idea—until he told them that some money would be necessary for advertising purposes. All very well—they said—but where was the money coming from? There were schools to finance, they added, and roads to be built. These and other things would take all the money they had.

Al tried to tell them that any money they spent for advertising their recreational advantages would return to them a hundred fold and that, in the end, they could afford far better schools and roads. But they didn't, or wouldn't understand.

At that point a lesser man would have quit. But not Al. Fighting against disallusment and despair, he slowly received the reluctant consent of the inhabitants to go ahead. Slowly, and on a small scale at first, he began advertising the city. Soon winter tourists were attracted. Not many, to be sure, at the start, but enough to show the value of the idea. More and more money was appropriated for advertising.

More and more winter sojourners were induced to vacation there. The rest is common knowledge—how St. Petersburg spends more for advertising than the whole of the State of Maine and how it has become the mecca for the old folks.

But, you say, what has all this got to do with Maine? Just this. There are thousands of these elderly residents of St. Petersburg who follow the weather north every year. With more money for advertising purposes I believe they could be attracted to Maine almost en masse. They are quiet, respectable and eminently desirable people. They come early, stay late, and pay their bills. They would be a profitable as well as a social asset to our state. I would like to see them here. I know you would too.

Rodney Gerard had the revolver in his hand before Prudence realized who had dashed into the room. With a relieved sigh Calloway dropped his hands.

"Put 'em up again!"

"Don't be a darn fool, Gerard."

"Put 'em up! There's blood on my forehead. Prue. Who hurt me?"

Prue's brain felt curiously light.

revolver steadily.

Beat it, you two guys—and beat with you at his heels. It's your job to deliver him to the sheriff after you've frisked Miss Schuyler's pearls off him. Get busy, Len."

How could Rodney be so cool, so smiling, Prudence wondered frantically.

"He don't need get busy. Here they are." The captive pulled the lovely, lustrous string from under his ragged, dirty shirt. Prudence snatched it from the floor and clutched it tight against her breast.

"Come across with those jewels!" Gerard poked a reminder.

"Listen, don't get fresh with the gat. I've coughed up the pearls, ain't I—an' I don't know nothin' about no jewels."

"Let him go! Let him go! I don't care about the jewels. Please let him go." The break in Prue's voice maddened her.

The muscles of Gerard's jaw tightened.

"On your way!" He held out the revolver. "Take it, Len. Don't let this bird stop till you have him safe behind bars."

Calloway gripped the gun. He said through clenched teeth:

"You're taking chances. How do you know I won't shoot you?"

Rodney Gerard regarded him through narrowed lids and smiled.

"Because you're such a just man, Len. Drop that ax, Prue, you won't need it again."

"Get going!" Calloway's fury was partially expended in the jab he gave the man at the other end of the revolver.

The door swung on its hinges.

Through the opening came the crackling of twigs under stumbling, heavy feet, rough voices. The sounds dwindled into forest silence.

"Is it safe to go now?" With unsteady fingers Prue tried to clasp the pearls about her throat.

"In just a minute. Let me do that. Bend your head, Gorgeous."

The husk in Gerard's voice, his fingers against the back of her neck set Prue shivering again.

"What's the matter?" He looked down at her skirt. "Your clothes are soaked. Your lips are blue. How did you get so wet? That's a mean bruise. What happened?"

"Lost my way. Fell into the b-brook."

He pulled off his coat. "Put your arms in. Don't argue. Do as you're told. It's not a perfect thirty-six, but it will help keep you warm."

"How did you know where I was?"

"Jeann got anxious about you. Turned back and met us. That child has a brain. She knew you shouldn't have gone with Calloway. Why, why did you do it?"

"Jim wished he could be out of the way when the g-gang arrived. I tried to help, and now you c-crab."

"I'm not crabbing. Don't you know that I almost lost my mind when Jean told me where you'd gone? Don't you know that I went through h—I getting to you? Don't you know that it's torture for me to see you shiver and have my hands tied by that infernal promise I made? If I were to touch you—"

The caressing break in his voice, the faint tremor of his lips sent the blood burning to Prue's hair.

"Oh, come on! Let's get out of here!" He pulled a flashlight from his coat pocket.

"Let's hurry! Hurry! I'm frozen!"

"Go on."

He followed as she entered the trail. Every swish of her wet skirts about her knees sent a million little icy shivers coasting along her veins.

Gerard faced her down the trail. The hand that touched her was like ice. Contrition swept her.

"You're freezing! Take your coat. I don't need it, really I don't."

"Stop talking. Go on! If you don't, I will carry you, and you are not a fairy, girl."

He was cold, but of course he wouldn't acknowledge it. Had he heard what Calloway had said about Milly and money—Och, how cold her legs and feet were—like sticks of ice! There! She had put the right one forward. Now the left—right—left—right—Had Rodney paid the circus girl's bills? Left—right—"Keep on feet!"—left—right—march time—the words were like a merry-go-round. She couldn't stop them. The clearing at last. Copper-red light on the trees. A fire? No, the sunset! A sky of rainbow splendor. The color warmed her, all except her feet. Right—left—they had frozen—

Someone caught her as she stumbled. Someone picked her up in his arms.

—right—Please—p-please—Jim—Jim—stop those words going round and round—

Someone smothered something between his teeth. Someone pulled off the coat, bundled her into something woolly and soft, something that smelled of tobacco, lifted her into a car. She was warmer. Those horrid words had stopped whirling. Why should she have thought for an instant that she was with Jim Armstrong? She looked at the man at the wheel.

"Thank goodness, you have put on your coat! It would be you—the man-of-the-moment," she said unsteadily.

He looked straight down into her eyes. Straight and deep.

"But all the time you thought I was Jim."

Prudence closed her lids tight. That pesky, "Left!" "Right!" started in her head again. She had better keep them open. Rodney Gerard needn't growl at her. Suppose she were to remind him of Milly Gooch and—lucky she had found that out in time!

Gerard drew a robe closer about her.

"Warmer, Gorgeous?"

If he spoke to her again in that unsteady voice, she would cry her heart out on his shoulder, then where would she be?

"Warmer—but—a roaring fire and a cup of hot tea will seem like heaven. Jim will—"

"Jim! Jim! You think of him every minute. Why don't you marry him?"

Prudence shut her eyes. She had been about to say that Jim would think him lost. He had handed her a weapon of defense. She rushed to her own destruction.

"I have had that idea myself—in fact it is quite settled."

The words seemed to twang in the air long after they were spoken, to vibrate like a violin string which had been roughly struck. What a lie! What an outrageous lie! She had stripped off honor and truth in a determination to protect herself from future heartache. What would Jim Armstrong say if he knew? He mustn't know. After what seemed hours of time and miles of road, she begged in what she recognized as absurd anti-climax.

"Please don't mention what I told you to anyone—even David. We—we don't want it known—at present. I—I—well, you made me angry and—and I just flung it at you."

"Don't worry. I shan't broadcast the good news. David and I had planned for you to dine at High Ledges tonight—he wanted to tell you of our experiences—but if you've taken cold—"

"I never take cold. As soon as I get off these wet clothes I'll be all right." How could she face Jim Armstrong, she wondered.

He lifted her out of the roadster and pulled off the robe. "You're shivering. There isn't a light in the house. Come on. I'm going in with you!"

He laid a compelling arm about her shoulders and drew her along the path. The knob of the front door turned under his hand. He followed her into the living room which was faintly lighted by blinking coals on the hearth.

"Sit in that wing chair. Don't try to talk."

He flung pine cones from the big copper kettle beside the fireplace on the embers. They blazed. Carefully he laid birch kindling; when that caught he piled on large logs and lighted the lamp.

Prudence protested hoarsely: "Please don't do anything more. I can take care of myself."

"Got a heater in the house? Is your room warm?"

"My own room upstairs? Only when I have a fire in the stove."

"Then I'll get your dry clothes. You can't stay in those wet things, and you are not going up to that cold room to change. Stick out your foot."

He dropped to one knee and unlaced the boot she automatically held out. For an instant she was dumb from surprise, but only for an instant.

"Rodney Gerard, don't dare go to my room."

"Did you say 'dare'? I'm going under the Trading with the Enemy act. It's being used this year."

He carefully removed the other boot, placed the pair side by side on the hearth, and crossed the room.

Huddled in the wing chair, she regarded him as he returned. Green crepe pajamas hung over one arm, her manner house coat striped in blue and green over the other. How had he known what to bring?

"Here you are! Get out of those wet things and into these."

He drew a chair in front of the fire and laid the garments over its back. Prudence regarded him with a superior smile, as superior as a smile could be with chattering teeth behind it.

"Just naturally helpful, aren't you? I haven't the slightest intention of ch-changing. I'll stay here until M-Mackey gets back."

Sermon subject, "Turning the Corner."

While we are thinking about New Year's resolutions here is one that is commended to all the families of the Parish.—We are a church-going congregation, and I intend during 1935 to do what I can to establish that reputation. It will be good for me and good for all of us. Some unfortunately cannot go to Church. We must try to bring the church to them. Others have drifted into careless habits about church-going. This is an excellent time to correct bad habits. And so this shall be my slogan during the New Year.—We are a church-going congregation.
A Happy and Prosperous New Year to us all.

HAPPY and prosperous New Year! All day the words had been flung at Bob Cameron; everywhere he went they echoed in his ears. He wanted to shut them out, to forget that a New Year was beginning.

Last night, in summing up the old year, he had come to the conclusion that he was an utter failure, that he might as well discard the idea of becoming a writer. Every story that he had sent out had come back. It was true that a few editors had encouraged him—one of the best known in the country had told him to keep on, that he had a fine literary style. But none of them had kept his offerings.

Bob felt that the wisest thing he could do was to chuck the whole thing at the beginning of the New Year. Yet down in his heart he knew that writing was a part of him; that it would be an almost impossible task to keep away from the untidy desk back in his den. But he would have to do it, a man couldn't hold a girl to a promise, with nothing to offer her but failure.

Bob knew that Dorothy Trent was back of his resolution to quit the writing game. He loved Dorothy and she loved him. They had been engaged since their senior year at Northwestern. It was time that he should say something about marriage; it was not fair to hold her as he was doing. He would have to get a position that would enable him to keep a girl like Dorothy.

"It Will Be Glorious to Help You Work Out Your Career."

oathy; he couldn't ask her to exist on the meager pittance he was getting from the Pryor company. He had taken the job simply because it gave him so much time for writing, caring nothing at the time for the small salary and the lack of opportunity that it held.

The unhappiness brought by his resolve showed plainly in the weary droop of Bob's shoulders and the tired lines on his boyish face. He found it hard to join in the small talk and fun of the New Year's party that was going on. If Dorothy hadn't been so insistent upon his coming, he would have remained away, for he was in no mood for frivolity. And now, an even deeper bitterness had crept into his heart, as he watched the crowd pay tribute to Everett Elstun, the literary lion of Raymondville.

He wondered how Dorothy had got Elstun to her party; he was a bit of a recluse and seldom mingled for the present.

with the crowd. He was surprised as he saw him walking across the room, with an eager look upon his face.

"How are you coming with the writing?" he asked.

Bob gave a mirthless laugh. "I've just decided that as a writer I'm pretty good hod-carrier. The matter of the matter is, Mr. Elstun, I made a New Year's resolution."

"Giving up in a hurry?" Elstun said, a trifle sharply.

"I've been trying for almost ten years," Bob answered.

"And you think a few hours more now and then for two years should have brought you success?" Elstun boy, I was writing full time for more than three years before I got a hit that I wasn't wasting ink."

In a moment Bob was confessing his real reason for quitting. Elstun listened quietly, then he spoke. "Too, had that problem," he said. "There was a girl; I felt sure I wouldn't be satisfied with what she had to offer. Fortunately, I found out in time she wanted to share my struggles. Maybe the girl you feels the same way."

Bob found that Elstun was right. Dorothy was aghast at the thought of his giving up the work he loved, or doubting that she would want to share his poverty. "It will be glorious to help you work out your career," she assured him.

So a new resolution was made that called for success instead of failure. The New Year was going to bring Bob the acceptance that he craved.
